Health care professionals are rightly revered for the care they provide to those in need – and they deserve to be safe in doing so. The system must work better for patients. Too often the patient is put last in the NHS, at the bottom of the pile. For example, research in England has suggested that delays to get vital inpatient surgical operations are particularly bad. Patients have to wait on average for almost 2 weeks for a planned operation. In general, working in the NHS is an adventure. But a shared and professional environment demands that we all take safety seriously and are knowledgeable about how to provide safe patient care. Failure to do so can place patients, families and staff in danger. Protecting patients means: ensuring staff are properly trained to provide safe patient care ensuring that patients’ needs are met through appropriate NHS patient safety initiatives and the new NHS Plan ensuring that patients’ best interests are central to the plan and NHS services are safe for patients paying particular attention to the key risks and harms for patients providing better support for patients and carers improving communication with patients and carers ensuring safe NHS use of medicines and devices ensuring patients are cared for safely after leaving hospital protecting patients while visiting services away from
