That can be the case whether they are framed or unframed. I sometimes find it helpful to make the spaces between photos a little wider in order to make it easier to read the captions. This is done with a variety of supplies at the local crafts store. The largest piece is a piece of wood that is one inch x one inch x five inches tall. It is very old, and has a lovely patina, but it can be sanded, repainted and waxed. It has a hole in the center for hanging the picture. To construct the frame, first assemble the pieces into a rectangle. (I usually cut a few pieces of cardboard into strips that fit around the edges of the frame.) Then paint the wood, paint over the cardboard and then wax over the wood. You can make the pieces of cardboard into a beautiful border or simply mold around the frame. For example, the edges of the rectangle are made from a single piece of cardboard that is cut in half so that the boards are adjacent to one another. Several years ago, I made a frame for the little girl in my life. They were having a party and, when I went to get the pictures, I came across the little girl with her little cousin. They were sitting in the sand and I asked them to pose for a few pictures and now that little girl has her own framed picture in her room. I also got a few pairs of wood glue (safety right?) for younger kids. These are quite small and are from the kitchen store. My kids were too young to safely use it, but I know that I could. on their own and do their own
