It wasnt until around 2007 that a more in-depth information started to emerge, including pictures and information from behind the scenes. First "press" releases came from a website called Plasmabscott.org and were not well received for obvious reasons. Although the only official links I can find point to a fan made website called "Green Pixel Productions" with no updates in over a year. The site is extremely poorly done with just 5 pages of barely readable text and a link to the Plasmabscott homepage. Its a shame as the website does contain a fairly good interview with the game designers that were taken in 2009. You can read more about the game at the Green Pixel Productions site, which has no updating info whatsoever, with only a newsgroup announcing that a new demo would be released in 2009. No new content has been added since. I would like to add some comments about this game and some of the stories that are going around about it. The game was a joint effort from Philip Brown (design), James Syson (art), and Matt Wilson (music). I found it very easy to get into this game, just by playing a demo (as with most games), but was a little disappointed. I had no idea what to expect as there was only the teaser and a very scanty story. An adventure game where the protagonist gets into a car to investigate a murder. To reach the place of murder the protagonist travels through a sewer trying to find
