The cationic-cationic interaction and the origin of the selective recognition between anionic species and cationic ligands. A complete investigation of the physicochemical aspects of the selective recognition between anionic species and a library of cationic ligands has been carried out. In particular, the measurements of the proton NMR-derived $[1-^{11}\text{C}]$ NMR-estimated association constant K_{ass} , obtained in DMSO- d_6 solution in the presence of halides, have revealed the occurrence of a selective interaction between the anionic species and the cationic ligands. The presence of selective recognition has been also suggested by the study of the concentration-dependent behavior of the cationic ligands and of their complexes with anions in DMSO- d_6 solution. This kind of interaction is attributed to a cation-cationic interaction. On the basis of both experimental results and a statistical thermodynamic treatment, it can be hypothesized that the cationic-cationic interaction can be responsible of the selective recognition between the anionic species and the cationic ligands.
