Keys are some of the most important keys to any application. Easy entry of keys means that users can use your application without having to worry about key entry. Every application has a way of describing user input to the system so that the user interface can present it to the user. If you would like to allow a user to use your application without any user training or input then this is the tool for you. Key macros are a keystroke combination that the user uses to control the application. Key macros are entered by the user in one of two ways. You can program the macro into the application itself (by entering it in the toolbar). You must enter the macro to the user by using the keystroke association tool and selecting the key combination from the popup menu. Programming the macro into the application allows you to set a default macro for each key in the application. The benefit of this is that you can use multiple applications without having to re-define the macro for each application. Key macros can be applied to every key, in every application, by programming them into your own application. Key macros can be saved into the 'custom' category of the application and are referenced by an abbreviation. Key macros can be named with descriptive words. Key macros can be made generic, to apply to any application. Macros can be applied to every key in the application, or a sub-category of keys. Macros can be applied to keys already defined. Keys already defined can be overridden if the macro matches. Your application can control the 'refresh' behavior of the key macros. Your application can be configured to control when the macro is displayed. Your application can be configured to control the behavior of the macro if the user presses a key which is not associated with the macro. You can specify where in the user interface a key macro is displayed, or if it is displayed at all. For each key macro that you define in Keymacro, you can define a default keystroke association. For each key macro you define, you can define a default keystroke association. No additional coding is required to add a key macro to an application. Keymacro currently supports the following applications: - The Amadeus suite - Web browsers - Dialog boxes - Others KEYMAC 1d6a3396d6
