ADVERTISEMENT This study is very similar to the 2007 study done by the Cooperative Congressional Election Study, which stated that the U.S. had just over 8,000 universities. The study conducted in 2014 by Stanford’s Center for Compute and Information Science found that America had fewer than 9,000 college graduates. The study concluded, “The United States is going to need a lot more colleges to handle its exploding college-age population. The reason: For the first time in history, the number of college graduates will start to fall next year and continue to decline over the next decade.” That would seem to not sit well with industry and other higher-ed administrators, since the study also found that those who studied in college were more likely to get a better job. “The nation’s 15-year college-graduation rate will be 3.4 percent lower than it would have been without the Great Recession,” the study found. ADVERTISEMENT So, in other words, maybe the recession has taught us something.Q: Can I use in the google map add marker?
