Cardiovascular disease prevention in a primary care population: a model based on the nonmedical use of prescribed medications. We assessed whether a model for the prevention of cardiovascular disease (CVD) in a general practice population is in place and whether this model can be applied in the primary care setting. A review of the practices of general practitioners (GPs) in the community revealed that 50.5% (n = 1,039) of patients received CVD risk assessments during the year. Twenty-five per cent of the population were smokers, and 77% of GPs considered smoking to be a greater CVD risk than blood pressure and cholesterol. More than 90% of the risk assessments identified the health risks, and 93% of the physicians perceived their role in CVD prevention to be as close to medical care as possible. However, only 28.5% of the GPs provided advice on smoking cessation, and 10% prescribed appropriate medications in the appropriate dosage. We identified the following changes in GP practice which would contribute to the prevention of CVD: recognition of the health risks of smoking; the inclusion of smoking cessation in routine CVD prevention; the prescription of appropriate medication with the correct dosage and instructions.
